How to Read a Posting

A job posting is evidence about one employer's opening at one time. It does not prove that every employer uses the same title, duties, education, or experience rules.

Separate these fields:

- responsibility: work the employee performs;
- skill: something the employee can do;
- qualification: a condition the applicant must meet;
- education or credential: a documented preparation requirement;
- preferred: helpful, but not always required.

For every record, cite the supplied posting card and its capture date.

One difference between a responsibility and a qualification:

Posting Card A — Instructional Aide Scenario

Fictional practice card based on common public-district posting fields. The employee supports instruction under a certified teacher, prepares materials, works with individuals or small groups, and helps maintain a safe learning environment. The card requires a diploma/equivalent and asks the applicant to meet the employer's stated paraprofessional and certification rules. Details must be verified in the live employer posting before anyone applies.

Two responsibilities:

Two skills or qualifications:

Education/credential language and one question to verify:

Posting Card B — Training Specialist Scenario

Fictional practice card based on common employer fields. The employee identifies learning needs, develops training materials, facilitates sessions, and evaluates whether the training worked. The card lists a bachelor's degree or equivalent documented preparation, clear communication, project organization, and experience creating learning materials. Actual employers may use different requirements.

Two responsibilities:

Two skills or qualifications:

Education/experience language and one question to verify:

Posting Card C — Museum Educator Scenario

Fictional practice card based on common museum-education fields. The employee plans visitor learning experiences, leads programs, works with collections or exhibits, and adapts explanations for different audiences. The card lists communication, research, group facilitation, and a relevant degree or equivalent preparation; actual institutions vary.
